Risks of Modern Slavery Practices

Supagas considers that operations and supply undertaken directly by Supagas employees are likely of low risk. Those activities undertaken by third-party suppliers could carry a higher risk (for example, migrant labour exploitation). Goods that are sourced from overseas likely carry the highest risk of modern slavery given that Supagas does not have direct oversight and is not present during manufacture and/or supply.

Actions Taken by Supagas

Supagas has further included clauses into its suppler agreements whereby the supplier must comply with modern slavery legislation.

Additionally, Supagas's national purchasing team ask questions in relation to modern slavery to suppliers assessed as medium to high risk.

Supagas has a national purchasing team that is responsible for reviewing each new supplier. Supagas has also implemented a delegation of authority, one objective of which, is to reduce the risk that the national purchasing team is circumvented in relation to the use of suppliers.

Supagas requires all driver contractor companies to complete and return a six-monthly declaration that they are complying with their employment and visa obligations.

Assessment of the Effectiveness of These Actions

All Supagas employees are required to comply with Supagas's Code of Conduct surrounding child labour and forced labour. Supagas's Code of Conduct is available to all employees. All Supagas staff are trained on Supagas's Code of Conduct and Policies. Failure to comply may lead to disciplinary action and even termination.

All Supagas employees are required to report any suspected incidences of non-compliance either internally to Supagas's Chief Compliance Officer or externally. Supagas treats any such reports seriously.

Supagas has not found incidences of modern slavery since the actions described above were implemented and considers the actions taken to be effective. Notwithstanding this, Supagas believes in continual improvement and is continually looking at ways to further reduce the risk of any incidences of modern slavery in Supagas's supply chain.

Year in Review

Through the difficulties presented by the effects of COVID-19, Supagas has continued to take modern slavery seriously. Since its 2021 Modern Slavery Statement, Supagas has continued to monitor its suppliers and review supplier answers to Supagas's on-boarding questionnaire. Those answers have not raised concerns in relation to modern slavery. Neither has Supagas received information that would give rise to modern slavery concerns in its supply chains. Supagas also continues to cooperate with customer modern slavery questionnaires.

To further strengthen Supagas's stance towards modern slavery, Supagas plans to introduce a modern slavery policy.
